SPANG TEACHES DURING INDIAN TRAINING PROGRAM

MISSOULA--

Alonzo T. Spang, director of the University of Montana Indian Studies Program, recently taught during a five-day training program in South Dakota for counselors, teachers, school administrators and students involved with the education of Indian students.

The short-term summer program, conducted at Huron College for graduate credit, was the third phase of a series designed and sponsored by the Huron facility to improve the chances for American Indians to complete college. Colleges in eight states were represented at the training program by a total of 50 participants.

Spang, who is completing requirements for his doctorate at Arizona State University, Tempe, discussed counseling theories related to Indian students during the program.

"I tried to show that a counselor of Indian students needs to modify and change his philosophy and approach to counseling because of the unique people he is dealing with," Spang said.
